The word "athlete" translates from Greek as "one who competes for a prize". The ancient Greeks didn't bother classifying their athletes as amateurs or professionals. All athletes shared the same passion for victory for a pretty simple reason: They wanted to strike it rich. The prizes they sought varied from the material—ancient trophies like cauldrons or tripods—to the immaterial—lifelong respect and prestige. Some unusual prizes included olive oil, clothing and animals. Athletes typically were rewarded with cash prizes by their city-states when they returned home, and some even got pensions for their victories. Athenian Olympic champions were even guaranteed one free meal a day for life. Athletes who won more than three events were immortalized by statues commissioned in their honour. These were placed in the temple of Zeus at Olympia. A few talented equestrian champs even got their images imprinted on coins.

9. We can understand from the passage that the ancient Greek perception of athletes was different because ----.

- A) their athletes were not encouraged by any kind of reward whatsoever
- B) they considered all the athletes to be inferior class of people who were in need of money
- C) there were more amateurs than professionals
- D) all the athletes performed or competed for profit or prize
- E) they were all given monthly payments and retirement allowances

10. One point made in the passage is that the prizes given to the Ancient Greek athletes ----.

- A) ranged from the tangible to the abstract
- B) were sometimes taken back by city-states
- C) didn't satisfy most of them very much
- D) could cause the loss of their reputation
- E) were all accompanied by statues in their honour

11. It can be concluded from the passage that athletic achievements ----.

- A) were always attributed to the presence of Zeus at Olympia
- B) could make it possible for athletes to be immortalized
- C) were valued differently for professionals and amateurs
- D) were the primary condition for being blessed by Zeus
- E) would be meaningless without cash prizes
