An article entitled “Television Addiction” in Scientific American examined why children and adults may find it hard to turn their TVs off. According to this article, viewers feel an instant sense of relaxation when they start to watch TV, but that feeling disappears just as quickly when the box is turned off. While people generally feel more energized after playing sports or engaging in hobbies, after watching TV they usually feel depleted of energy. In addition, time spent in front of the TV is often at the expense of more active pastimes. What’s worse, besides encouraging a sedentary lifestyle, television can contribute to obesity through the advertising of junk food. Most food advertising on children’s TV shows is for fast foods, candy and pre-sweetened cereals. Commercials for healthy food make up only 4 per cent of those shown.

8. The word ‘sedentary’ in the passage is used to describe a lifestyle in which the person is ----.

- A) always busy and active
- B) in a confused state of mind
- C) full of energy and uneasy
- D) sitting a great deal; inactive
- E) worn out and depressed

9. According to the passage, ----.

- A) unlike a sports activity or hobby, TV uses up people’s energy
- B) watching TV produces a permanent feeling of relaxation
- C) TV viewers are usually those that cannot find any other pastime activities or hobbies
- D) as compared to adults, it is harder for children to turn off their TVs
- E) television may contribute to obesity in that people tend to eat more snacks while watching it

10. It can be concluded from the passage that ----.

- A) people who find pastime activities or sports too expensive to engage in naturally turn to watching TV
- B) in contrast to adults, children become more energetic and active after watching TV
- C) TV viewing induces a feeling of relaxation, but it is not as rewarding as doing sports
- D) thanks to TV commercials for healthy food, people have started to develop healthy eating habits
- E) it is best to watch TV after doing a sports activity, which makes people feel more energized
